Forms: 6 garra-gascoyne, 6-7 galli, gally gascoi (g)n(e), -gascoyne, (6) galligascoun, gallie gascoine, gallo-gascaine, 7 galligaskin, 7-9 gally-gaskin, (9) galligaskin, 7- galligaskin. [app. an interpretative corruption of the 16th c. F. garguesque, a metathetic var. of grieguesque, ad. It. grecchesa sb., originally fem. of grecchesco Greek (this kind of hose being in 16th c. described as alla grecchesa = F. à la grecque in the Greek fashion). The surviving Fr. word in this sense is grigue, ad. Pr. grega or Sp. griega, orig. the fem. of the adj., Pr. griego, Sp. griego, Greek.

The form garra-gascoyne seems to prove that the Fr. word is really the source. The synonymous gally-breeches, gally-slops (see GALLY a.1 or sb.) occur earlier than, and gasc (g)n, GASKIN 1, about the same time with, the present word. If they are really older, the perversion of garguesque into galligaskin is fully accounted for. They may, however, have originated in a false analysis of galligaskin, which in that case must have been corrupted from garguesque by the influence of GASCON and GALLEY sb. (less probably L. Galli, Gallus, GAUL, or gally GALLOWS in the sense 'braces'). The early examples associate galligaskins with 'shipmen's hose', and imply that the fashion belonged to the south of Europe, so that it would be very natural for popular etymology to connect the word with galley.]

[The first element in this word (occurring also in GALLEY-DISH, GALLEY-TILE) is of uncertain origin, but possibly identical with GALLEY sb. 1, in which case the words etymologically denote pottery such as was brought in galleys, i.e. imported from the Mediterranean. Cf. GALLEY-HALFPenny.]

The Du. synonym gleipot is not recorded till a century later than the date of our earliest examples of the English word, and the editors of the great Dutch dictionary think that its first element may possibly be identical with glei (frequent in the 17th c.), a variant of galei GALLEY sb. 1. In support of this view, it is pointed out that the Du. kraak-god, kraakporslein mean literally 'porcelain imported in carracks', and a passage is quoted from the Invt. v. Brussel II. 206 which mentions 'glass-ware brought in galleys and carracks' (que les galees et les carraques amènent). Farther, gleyers-werk is explained by Kilian as meaning Balearic or Majorcan pottery (cf. MAJOLICA). On the other hand, the word glei is given in Kilian and Du. dict. of the 17th c. as a name for porcelain clay; but it has not been found in any text, except in the compound gleibacker, gley baker 'porcelain baker'; and it may have been merely formed by misinterpretation of the compounds gleipot and gleiwerk, gleigoed (glazed pottery).]

1. An apparatus for inflicting the punishment of death by hanging, usually consisting of two uprights and a cross-piece, from which the criminal is suspended by the neck. Sometimes used as equivalent to CROSS. See CROSS sb. 1.

In OE. the sing. galga and the pl. galgan are both used for 'a gallows', the pl. having reference presumably to the two posts of which the apparatus mainly consisted. Occasional examples of the sing. form occur in ME., and even down to the 17th c.; but from the 13th c. onwards the plural galwes and its later phonetic representatives have been the prevailing forms. So far as our material shows, Caxton is the first writer to speak of 'a gallows', but it is, of course, possible that the pl. form was sometimes treated as a sing. much earlier. From the 16th c. gallows has been (exc. arch. in 'a pair of gallows') used as a sing., with a new plural gallowers; the latter, though perh. not strictly obsolete, is now seldom used; the formation is felt to be somewhat uncouth, so that the use of the word in the plural is commonly evaded.

6. A definite portion of play in any 'game' (sense 4), terminated by the victory of one side, or the recognition that no victory can be gained; 'a match at play' (J.).

Gander (gændər), sh. Forms: 1 gau(d)re, 3-4 gandro, 5 gandero, (-dir, -dur), gonder, 6 gandro, Sc. ganar, gan(n)er, 9 dial. ganner, gonder, 4-gandor. [The orig. stem is perhaps ganron-*, the d being a euphonic insertion between n and r as in thunder :- OE. þunor. Outside of English the word is found only in Du., LG. and South Ger. gander, MLG. ganre; the other Teut. languages show different formations, as G. gänser-ich (earlier ganser), ON. gasse, Sw. gåse. Although used as the masc. of Goose (OE. gōs :- OTeut. gans*) there is some doubt whether it is etymologically cognate with that word. While goose represents an oAryan ghaus-* with palatal gh, it is possible that OE. gandras may be cognate with Lith. gāndras stork; this would imply a root beginning with velar gh-, to which may also be referred OE. ganot GANNET, OHG. ganazzo, ganzo (MHG. ganze, also genz), Du. gent, all meaning 'gander'. Cf. gania, said by Pliny N.H. vi. xxii. 27 to be the Ger. name of a small white goose, OF. ganle, janle, ganle, wild goose, Pr. ganla wild goose (in the mod. dialects variously used for 'wild goose', 'black stork', and 'heron'). It has been conjectured that gander may have been originally the special name of some kind of water-bird, and that its association with goose is accidental, perh. arising from the alliterative phrase 'goose and gander'.

9. A company of workmen.

This and the following senses appear to be peculiar to Eng.; the ON. dranga-ganger, etc., have often been compared, but gang-r in these compounds means not 'gang', but the act of going about. It would appear that in nautical use the word meaning 'set of things' (sense 8) was extended to the sense 'set of persons', 'crew', which had earlier been expressed by the cognate and like-sounding GING.

10. Any band or company of persons who go about together or act in concert (chiefly in a bad or depreciatory sense, and in mod. usage mainly associated with criminal societies).

b. To be of a gang: to belong to the same society, to have the same interests.

The resemblance between this and OF. estre a une gaigne, to be member of a company, is probably accidental. 1669 Perry's Diary 4 Mar., This company, both the ladies and all, are of a gang. 1681 *Trial S. The use of the verb is also greatly restricted in favour of Go, OE. gān, which finally supplanted gang exc. in the northern dialects. The same tendency appears in most of the cognate languages; thus Du. gaan (pa. t. ging, pa. pple. gegaan), G. gehen (ging, gegangen), Sw. gå (gick, gått), Da. gaa (gik, gaaet), but Icel. ganga (rarely gá from Da.). Gang, however, survives to some extent in various G. dialects and in Fris. For the relation between this and Go, see the latter.

[1. OF. garison, garisson, guarison (ONF. warison WARISON), defence, safety, provision, store, f. garir, guarir, to defend, preserve, furnish, ad. OHG. warjan to defend (= OE. werian WEAR v. 2). Senses 1 and 2 agree with the uses of the French word. The further development is app. due to confusion with F. garison GARRISON, which had the same meanings of 'defence' and 'supplies', as well as that of 'garrison'. There is not sufficient evidence to show that the last was ever a common sense of F. garison: Godefroy gives only one quotation for it. It seems probable that the specially English sense of 'fortress', 'stronghold' (see p. led to the identification of the two words and to the final adoption of 'garrison' in place of 'garison'.]

2. The Garter, the badge of the highest order of English knighthood. Hence, membership of this order; the order itself.

The institution of the order is commonly (on the authority of Froissart) attributed to Edward III about the year 1344. By the time of Selden (1614) it was traditionally asserted that the garter was that of the Countess of Salisbury, which fell off while she danced with the King, who picked it up and tied it on his own leg, saying to those present Honi soit qui mal y pense. The Garter as the badge of the Order is a ribbon of dark-blue velvet, edged and buckled with gold, and bearing the above words embroidered in gold, and is worn below the left knee; garters also form part of the ornament of the collar worn by the Knights.

Gas (gæs), sb. Pl. gases (gæ'séz). Forms: 7-8 gass, 8-9 gas, 7- gas. [A word invented by the Dutch chemist, J. B. Van Helmont (1577-1644), but avowedly suggested by the Gr. γᾶς ('halitum illum Gas vocavi, non longe a Cbao veterum secretum.' Ortus Medicinæ, ed. 1652, p. 59 a); the Dutch pronunciation of g as a spirant accounts for its being employed to represent Gr. γ.]

Van Helmont's statement having been overlooked, it has been very commonly supposed that he modelled his word on Du. geest spirit, an idea found at least as early as 1775 (Priestley On Air Introduct. 3). Van H. also invented the term BLAS, which has not survived, while gas has been adopted (usually in the same form) in most European languages; the spelling in F. and Pg. is gaz, which was also employed by English writers for a time.]

† 1. An occult principle supposed by Van Helmont to be contained in all bodies, and regarded by him as an ultra-rarefied condition of water (see quot. 1662). Obs.

But Gas is self, materially taken, is water as yet masked with the Ferment of composed Bodies. 1692 Tr. Blanchard's Phys. Diet. (1693) 99/2 Gas, a term used by Helmont, and signifies a spirit that will not congregate, or the Spirit of Life, a Balsom preserving the Body from Corruption. 1743 Land. & Country Brew. ii. 2. Any aeriform or completely elastic fluid; matter in the condition of an aeriform fluid. Usually applied only to those elastic fluids which remain such at ordinary atmospheric temperatures; the gaseous forms of substances ordinarily found solid or liquid being by preference called vapours.

3. spec. a. Gas of a kind suitable to be burnt for illuminating or heating purposes; originally, and still chiefly, = COAL-GAS, but now including various artificial mixtures consisting chiefly of carburetted hydrogen, and distinguished by defining words indicating the source from which they are obtained, as water-gas, oil-gas, etc.

The first experiments in the use of coal-gas for illumination are said to have been made by Dr. Clayton, rector of Crofton about 1688; the practical introduction of gas-lighting was due to Murdoch 1792-1808.

Gate (gæt), sb. 1. Forms: a. 1. gate, get (North. umd. æet, æat(t), 2-4 geat, (3 gate), 2-6 geat, 3-5 3at(t), 3-5, 6-9 dial. yat(t), 4-6 yhat, et, zett, 5-6 yet(e), 7-9 dial. yeat(t), 6- St. yet, B. (1 pl. gat), 2-6 gat, (4 gate, 5 gayt, 6 gat), 3-gate. [OE. geat str. neut., corresponds formally to OFris. gat, jet, hole, opening, OS. gat eye of a needle (LG. and Du. gat gap, hole, breach), ON. gat (see GAT) = OTcut. type gato*^m. The word is wanting in Goth. and HG.]

The ulterior etymology is obscure. Some scholars refer the word to the root of GET v., supposing the etymological sense to be either 'receptacle' (hence 'cavity', 'hole', 'opening') or 'means of reaching' (hence 'way of access'). It is however very uncertain whether it is allied either to GET or to GATE sb.

The original OE. declension was gat, gates, gate in the sing., and gatu, -a, -um in the plur., according to the phonetic law by which a became æ exc. when a back vowel followed in the next syllable. Subsequently the g (=y) before æ became palatalized, and the influence of the palatal caused the change of æ into ea. Hence the stem assumed the two forms geat- and gat-, which are respectively represented by the a and ð types in the later language. In late OE. the functional distinction between the two types was already disappearing through the operation of analogy, so that we find such forms as gates, gate (sing.) and gatu, geatum (pl.); in Mercian the forms geatu, -um (with guttural) are earlier, being due not to analogy but to the phonetic laws of the dialect. In ME. the a forms are universal in northern and in north- and west-midland writers, and also prevailed in the s.w. (Robert of Gloucester, the South-Eng. Legendary, etc.); the MSS. of Chaucer have gate in some passages and gate in others. Since the 16th c. gate has been the sole form in literary English; dialectally the forms with y remain in northern and north-midland districts, so far as they have not been displaced by the influence of the literary language; occasionally they are found surviving elsewhere, as in N.Devon and at Banbury (Ellis Phonol. Eng. Dialects).

Gate (g^{at}), sh.² Now only Sc. and north. dial. Forms: a. 3-gate, (3, 5 gatt(e), 4-5 gat). B. 5-7 gaite, gayte, 4, 8 Sc. get(e), 8 Sc. gaet, 9 dial. geat. See also GAIT. [a: ON. gata, wk. fem. (Sw. gata, Da. gade) = OHG. gaza (MHG. gasse, mod. Ger. gasse lanc, whence early mod. Du. gasse, now dial. gas), Goth. gataub = O.Tent. *gataubin.]

As to the ulterior etymology nothing has been ascertained. Connexion with the root of GET v. has been supposed for this as for GATE sh.¹; some have assumed a root 'ghad meaning 'to go', on the ground of the OIr. dia n-gaidh he went. The spelling gait (gayte) first appears in the 15th c., but was almost confined to Sc. and northern writers until the beginning of the 17th c. It remains in the only sense of the word which is current in literary English: see GAIT sh.¹ (A supposed example of this spelling has been found in the Cotton MS. of the Curior. M., line 15278; but this is prob. a mistake: see GATE sh.³.)

Gauiche, gauicy: see GAUSY.

Gaud, sb. Obs. exc. Hist. In quots. gaude. See also GAUDY sb. [Of somewhat uncertain origin.]

Du Gange cites an Anglo-Latin document of 1415 which has gaudia (pl. of gaudium joy) in this sense. It does not appear that gaudia was so used on the continent, and in this example it is prob. only a latinization of the Eng. word. At the same time, it seems likely that the L. gaudia is really the source, and that the 'gauds' were so called as serving to mark the fifteen mysteries (the first five of which are 'joyful mysteries') to be meditated upon in reciting the fifteen decades of aves. An A.F. gaudes pl., app. in this sense, occurs in a document of 1381 (Nichols Royal Wills 1780 100). Cf. also 17th c. F. gaudees, explained in Oudin's Fr. It. Dict. as 'prayers without attention' (Godef.).

The OFr. word is found, along with the related vb. gauger, in the 13th c.; the earliest sense appears to be 'action or result of measuring', the sense 'instrument of measurement' being prob. derivative; the sb. is perh. f. the vb. Possibly there may be ultimate connexion with jale bowl, galon GALLON (so Litre), or with jalon stake to measure from (so Scheler). Horning's conjecture that the word represents Teut. gallon-* (see GALLONS) in its assumed primary sense of 'rod' is not very satisfactory from the Teut. point of view; derivation from L. agualificāre* or qualificāre (Diez) is impossible.

The spelling gauge prevails in this country, except in sense 5. The more normal gage has been adopted in recent American Dicts. The form gauge is a mere blunder.]

(the e for y being a mark of Kentish dialect), f. gafol (GAVEL sb.) + gecynd nature, species, KIND.]

When the meaning of the word came to be misunderstood (see 2), attempts were made to assign to it an etymology expressive of the custom of equal division of a deceased person's land among his male children; favourite explanations in the 16th c. were 'give all kinde' (Rastell 1557), and 'give all kyn' (Lambarde 1576); sometimes the word was written in pseudo-etymological fashion as gavealkin, gavealkind. The application of the Kentish term to the Welsh and Irish system of succession led to the notion that the word was of Celtic origin: a Welsh derivation from gafael to take, and cefned race, family, was proposed in the 16-17th c.; an alleged Irish gabhal-cine (from gabhal to take, taking, and cine tribe, sept) appears with the rendering 'gavelkind' in O'Reilly's Irish Dictionary.]

1. The name of a land-tenure existing chiefly in Kent.

The name implies that it was originally a tenure by 'gavel', i.e. by the payment of rent or fixed services other than military; this agrees with the identification of it with Socage (quot. 1253). After the Conquest, the Kentish form of socage was distinguished by certain customs elsewhere generally disused (cf. quot. 1702). Of these the most conspicuous was the custom by which a tenant's land at his death was divided equally among his sons: hence, even in early times, 'gavelkind' and 'partible land' are used as equivalent terms.

3. transf. a. A Welsh custom of dividing property, similar to the Kentish practice.

The Statutum Wallie, 12 Edw. I. c. 13 recounts that the Welsh custom of inheritance differs from the English, 'eo quod hereditas partibilis est inter heredes masculos'; the statute sanctions this custom, but provides that bastard sons shall no longer be entitled to share with those born in wedlock.

Gavelock (gævələk). Obs. exc. Hist. and dial.

Forms: 1 gafeluc, gaveluc, 2-4 gaveloc, 4-6 gavelok (gaw-), 5 gavielok, gavylok, 6 gafaiok. 6-7 gavelocke, 9 gavlōc(k), gowelock, dial. geavelock (-lick), 4, 7- gavelock. [OE. gafelic str. masc. has the form of a regular dim. of gafel, gafel fork (see GABLE sb.); the senses, however, are somewhat difficult to account for on this view of the etymology: evidence is lacking for the supposition that the word originally meant a forked or barbed arrow (cf. FORK sb. 9) and a forked crowbar.]

Words of closely similar form and meaning are ON. gafak, gafok neut. javelin (perh. adopted from Eng.), Welsh gafach said to mean 'bearded arrow', Irish gabla lance, ONF. gavelot (12th c.), gavelot, gavelot, garlot (= Central F. javelot, It. giaccolotto) javelin, whence MDu. gavelot, gaverlot, MHG. gabilt; see also GAFF sb. The relation between the words is uncertain. Thurneysen, followed by most recent etymologists, regards the Romic word as of Celtic origin; the OE. word may possibly be adopted from the OF. (though recorded earlier) or from its source.]

The earliest quots. give its value as about three farthings, but Cotgr. says of the F. gazette, 'scarce worth our farling'; and quot. 1682 agrees with this. Probably its worth varied in different places, as it was coined at Venice for circulation in the Levant.

In late 17th and early 18th c., the word came to be accented on the final syllable, and it is so marked by Johnson. Cowper (Table Talk 37) again accents it in the original fashion.]

1. A news-sheet; a periodical publication giving an account of current events. (Now only Hist.)

The gazetta was first published in Venice about the middle of the 16th c., and similar news-sheets appeared in France and England in the 17th. The untrustworthy nature of their reports is often alluded to by writers of that period; thus Florio explains gazette as 'running reports, daily news, idle intelligences, or flim flam tales that are daily written from Italie, namely from Rome and Venice'.

1605 B. Jonson Volpone v. iv. (1607) M. 3, O. I shall see the fable of all feasts; The freight of the Gazetti. 1611 R. RICHMOND Panegyric Verses, in Coryat Crudities c. 2 b. b. Of a person: A news-monger. (So F. gazette.) 1702 FARQUHAR Twin Rivals i. 1. (1703) 2 For that reason I communicate: I know thou art a perfect Gazette, and will spread the News all over the Town.

2. spec. One of the three official journals entitled The London Gazette, The Edinburgh Gazette, and The Dublin Gazette, issued by authority twice a week, and containing lists of government appointments and promotions, names of bankrupts, and other public notices. Hence sometimes used gen. for the official journal of any government. To be in the gazette: to be published a bankrupt.

The first official journal published in England was The Oxford Gazette, the first number of which appeared in Nov. 1665, when the Court was at Oxford on account of the plague. Gelatin, gelatine (dzelæ'tin). [a. F. gelatine, orig. 'an excellent white broth made of the fish Maigre' (Cotgr.), ad. It. gelatina, f. gelata JELLY. In medical Latin gelatina was adopted as a term for 'any sort of clear gummy juice, as the Juice of Fruits, the Jelly of Quinces, etc.' (Phillips, ed. Kerscy 1706); in the 18th c. the F. gelatine was occasionally used in medical books in this sense, and with the rise of scientific chemistry came to be restricted to its present use. On the analogy of this and some other words, the suffix -ine (see -INE, -IN) was adopted by chemists for forming names of 'extractive principles'. In popular use the spelling is commonly gelatine, and the pronounc. is often (dzelæ'tin); in chemical use consistency demands the form gelatin.]

1. The substance which is the basis of the jellies into which certain animal tissues (skin, tendons, ligaments, the matrix of bones, etc.) are converted when treated with hot water for some time. It is amorphous, brittle, without taste or smell, transparent, and of a faint yellow tint; and is composed of carbon, hydrogen, nitrogen, oxygen, and sulphur.

It is used in the preparation of soups, jellies, etc., and latterly in many photographic processes; it is also pressed into thin sheets for making transparent cards.

-gen (džen), suffix, forming sb. in mod. scientific use; ad. F. -gène, ultimately repr. Gr. -γενής (f. γεν- root of γεν-εσθαι to be born, become, γεν-εσθαι to beget, γένος kind, etc.: see KIN) an adjective suffix which has two different uses: (1) giving the sense 'born in a certain place or condition', as in οκω-γενής, ἐνδο-γενής born in the house (respectively f. οκω house and ἐνδο within); (2) giving the sense 'of a (specified) kind', as in δυσ-γενής of the same kind, homogeneous, ἑτερο-γενής of another kind, heterogeneous. The F. -gène in scientific terms has two distinct applications (of different origin) both of which have been adopted in Eng.

1. Chem. In 1777-9 Lavoisier (Éléments II. 249) proposed for the recently discovered element (till then known as 'dephlogisticated air', etc.) the alternative names principe acidifiant and principe oxygène, which he states to be etymologically synonymous. In G. de Morveau Nomencl. chimique 1787 (prepared in collaboration with Lavoisier and other chemists) the sbs. oxygène and hydrogène occur, and are explained to mean 'engendrant l'acide' and 'engendrant l'eau'; and in Lavoisier's Traité de Chimie 1789 the etymon of the suffix is said to be 'Gr. γενεσθαι, j'engendre'. This etymology accounts for Lavoisier's original form oxygine; the change of -gine into -gène must have been due to the observation that -gine did not occur in Gr. derivatives, while -gène, from the same root, already existed in ἡδερρογένη, homogène (ad. Gr. words in -γενής: see above); the fact that the suffix -γενής in Gr. words was not capable of meaning 'that which produces' was overlooked or disregarded. The names oxygène, hydrogène were soon adopted into Eng. with the ending -gène, afterwards altered to -gen. On the analogy of these words, a considerable number of new terms have been added to the common (French and Eng.) vocabulary of chemistry, in which the ending -gène, -gen expresses the sense 'that which produces'; they are usually names of chemical substances, as nitrogen, amido-gen, cyanogen, etc.; rarely of classes of substances, as halogen, + amphigen.

2. Bot. The botanical use of -gène was introduced in 1813 by Decandolle (Théorie de Botanique 210) in the words endogène, exogène, adjs. designating two classes of plants which respectively produce their new tissue internally (Gr. ἐνδο-ν within) and externally (Gr. ἐξω outside). The formation of the words was suggested by the older terms endorhize, exorhize. Decandolle gives as the etymon of the suffix γενεω [sic], 'j'engendre, je crois'; app. his -gène was not a new adoption from Gr. -γενής, but a different application of the -gène already used in chemical terms, which he vaguely remembered to be derived from a Gr. root meaning 'to produce, to grow'. The adjs. endogène, exogène first came into Eng. in the adapted forms endogenous, exogenous; Lindley c 1845 formed from these the sbs. endogen, exogen; and he and others added many analogous terms denoting classes of plants, the first element indicating the part at which the new growth takes place, or some characteristic of their mode of growth, as acrogen, amphigen, dictyogen, thallogen.

†b. The nervous gender: the nervous system [= F. le genre nerveux].

2. Gram. Each of the three (or in some languages two) grammatical 'kinds', corresponding more or less to distinctions of sex (and absence of sex) in the objects denoted, into which substantives are discriminated according to the nature of the modification they require in words syntactically associated with them; the property (in a sb.) of belonging to, or (in other parts of speech) of having the form appropriate to concord with, a specified one of these kinds. Also, the distinction of words into 'genders', as a principle of grammatical classification.

In the Indo-European langs. there were originally three genders, the masculine and feminine, to which respectively belonged the great majority of nouns denoting male and female persons or animals; and the neuter, including chiefly nouns denoting things without sex. But great numbers of words denoting inanimate objects were of the masculine or feminine gender, without even any figurative attribution of sex; and in some cases the names of objects possessing sex were of the neuter gender. In Semitic, and in the Romanic langs., there are only two genders, masculine and feminine. In many langs. the adjectives, and in some langs. the verbs, have inflexions depending on the gender of the sbs. to which they syntactically refer. Mod. English has 'natural' as opposed to 'grammatical' gender; i.e. nouns are masculine, feminine or neuter according as the objects they denote are male, female, or of neither sex; and the gender of a noun has no other syntactical effect than that of determining the pronoun that must be used in referring to it. For common, epicene gender, see those words.

[The Eng. use in this sense follows the Lat. use of genus, which in its turn is a rendering of the equivalent Gr. γένος. The formulation of the three grammatical genders (τὰ γένη τῶν ὀνομάτων, ἀπὸ καὶ θήλεα καὶ σκεῖν) is ascribed by Aristotle Rhet. III. v. to Protagoras.]

A. The difference of nouns according to Sex. The difference, whereby a word is noted to signify the male, or female, or neither; that is, either he or she, or neither of them. 1751 HARRIS Hermes t. iv. (xviii) 61 Gender... descends to every Individual, however diversified. 1783 BLAIR Lect. Rhet. I. viii. 144 Gender, being founded on the distinction of the two sexes... can only find place in the names of living creatures, which admit the distinction of male and female. 1824 L. MURRAY Eng. Gram. (ed. 5) I. 76 Gender is the distinction of nouns, with regard to sex. There are three genders, the masculine, the feminine, and the neuter. 1887 EARLE Philol. Eng. Tongue (ed. 4) § 383 In the English language as now current, the traditional Gender of ancient Grammar is entirely extinct.

b. By some recent philologists applied, in extended sense, to the 'kinds' into which sbs. are discriminated by the syntactical laws of certain langs. the grammar of which takes no account of sex.

Thus the North American Indian langs. are said to have two 'genders', animate and inanimate. With still greater departure from the original sense, the name 'genders' has been applied to the many syntactically discriminated classes of sbs. in certain South African langs.

2. Production by natural or artificial processes (as of plants, animals, substances, etc.). † Also, mode of formation, nature of origin (obs.).

In medieval philosophy, following Aristotle, generation (γένεσις) and corruption (φθορά) are often mentioned as contrary processes, together comprehending all the changes which take place in the universe. Hence the frequent allusive use of the words, e.g. in quot. 1611.

II. That which is generated.

The use of the word in senses 3-6 is largely due to the frequent occurrence of generatio in the Vulgate. Translators were probably uncertain as to the exact meaning of it in certain passages, as Isa. liii. 8, to which the following seems to be the earliest reference in English.

13. . . E. E. Allit. P. A. 827 Hys generacynoun quo recen con, Pat dyed for vus in Iherusalem?

†5. Fruit, produce (of the vine). Obs. rare.

A rendering of genimen (vitis) (Matt. xxvi. 29) = Gr. γένημα (trou άένισ). Wyclif and later translators use 'fruit'.

4. The offspring of the same parent or parents, regarded as a single degree or step in the descent of a person or family from an ancestor; also, in wider sense, = DEGREE 3.

In reckoning genealogies, each generation is naturally restricted to one individual in the direct line, without regard to collateral descendants.

5. The whole body of individuals born about the same period; also, the time covered by the lives of these.

In reckoning historically by 'generations', the word is taken to mean the interval of time between the birth of the parents and that of their children, usually computed at thirty years, or three generations to a century.

A 1340 Hamptre Psalter ix. 8 pou lord sal seme vs & kepe vs fra bis generacioun. 1535 Coverdale Mark vii. 12 Why doth this generacion seke a token? OF. geneure (F. genévère) :—L. jūniperus juniper.] A spirit distilled from grain, and flavoured with the juice of juniper berries; it is made in Holland, and is hence also called Hollands, formerly Hollands Geneva. (Often written with capital G by confusion with GENEVA.)

In the shortened form GIN, the name chiefly denotes a spirit of British manufacture, originally an imitation of the Dutch spirit, and usually flavoured not with juniper but with some substitute; but the words are sometimes used indiscriminately. In many works of reference in the 18th c. and even later, geneva is explained as the name of a spirit distilled, or obtained by fermentation, from juniper berries; but it does not appear that this was ever correct.

Genius (dʒɛniʊs). Pl. genii (dʒɛni'i), geniuses, († genius's). [a. L. genius, f. gen-* root of gignere to beget, Gr. γενεσθαι to be born, come into being.]

In Lat. the word has mainly the sense 1 below (the extended sense 2 occurs post-classically), and a fig. sense approaching 3. As a word of learned origin it is found in the Rom. langs. F. génie (whence Ger. genie), It., Sp., Pg. genio, which have approximately the same senses as in Eng. To some extent the sense-development in Rom. has been affected by confusion with ingenium (see ENGINE): cf. for example F. génie civil 'civil engineering'.]

5. (Only in sing.) Native intellectual power of an exalted type, such as is attributed to those who are esteemed greatest in any department of art, speculation, or practice; instinctive and extraordinary capacity for imaginative creation, original thought, invention, or discovery. Often contrasted with talent.

This sense, which belongs also to F. génie, Ger. genie, appears to have been developed in the 18th c. (It is not recognized in Johnson's Dictionary.) In sense 4 the word had come to be applied with especial frequency to the kind of intellectual power manifested by poets and artists; and when in this application 'genius', as native endowment, came to be contrasted with the aptitudes that can be acquired by study, the approach to the modern sense was often very close. The further development of meaning was prob. influenced by association with senses 2 and 3, which suggested that the word had an especial fitness to denote that particular kind of intellectual power which has the appearance of proceeding from a supernatural inspiration or possession, and which seems to arrive at its results in an inexplicable and miraculous manner. This use, which app. originated in England, came into great prominence in Germany, and gave the designation of Genieperiode to the epoch in German literature otherwise known as the 'Sturm und Drang' period. Owing to the influence of Ger. literature in the present century, this is now the most familiar sense of the Eng. word, and usually colours the other senses. It was by the Ger. writers of the 18th c. that the distinction between 'genius' and 'talent', which had some foundation in Fr. usage, was sharpened into the strong antithesis which is now universally current, so that the one term is hardly ever defined without reference to the other. The difference between genius and talent has been formulated very variously by different writers, but there is general agreement in regarding the former as the higher of the two, as 'creative' and 'original', and as achieving its results by instinctive perception and spontaneous activity, rather than by processes which admit of being distinctly analyzed. 1749 FIELDING Tom Jones xiv. 1, By the wonderful force of genius only, without the least assistance of learning. 1755 W. Gent (dʒent), sb. [Short for GENTLEMAN.] = GENTLEMAN; now only vulgar, exc. as applied derisively to men of the vulgar and pretentious class who are supposed to use the word.

Early prose examples are doubtful, as they may represent only the graphic abbreviation which was formerly common; 'Gents' may be an editorial misreading for 'Gent.' = gentleman. Early in the present century the word was colloquial and slightly jocular; but about 1840 its use came to be regarded as a mark of low breeding.

Genteel (dʒentɪl), a. and sb. Forms: 6-8 gentile, 8 gentil, 7- genteel. [A re-adoption, at the end of the 16th c., of F. gentil, which had been previously adopted in the 13th c., and had assumed the form GENTLE.

The re-adoption first appears in the form gentile, distinguished from GENTILE (=non-Jewish) by retaining the Fr. pronunciation of the i and the stress on the last syllable. It is probable that it was originally fashionable to retain the Fr. nasal sound in the first syll.; hence the vulgar pronunciation represented by the spelling 'jontel', which occurs in comic literature of the early 17th c. The fully Anglicized spelling genteel came in at the end of the 17th c.; see also GENTER, which corresponds more nearly to the pronunciation of the Fr. word, in which the i is silent. Another attempt to render the Fr. sound is JAUNTY.

A few years before the middle of the 18th c. the word was much ridiculed as being characteristic of those who are possessed with a dread of being taken for 'common people' or who attach exaggerated importance to supposed marks of social superiority. In seriously laudatory use it may now be said to be a vulgarism; in educated language it has always a sarcastic or at least playful colouring.]

1. Logic. A class or kind of things which includes a number of subordinate kinds (called SPECIES) as sharing in certain common attributes; a general concept. (One of the five PREDICABLES, q.v.)

Each species is distinguished from all the others in the genus by the possession of some peculiar attribute or group of attributes, called its 'specific difference' or DIFFERENTIA. Highest genus (L. summum genus), one which does not become subordinated as species to a higher genus; subaltern genus, one which is also a species of some higher genus.

Hunter* (1863) 38 You individualise your object by showing in what it differs from the others of the genus.

2. Zool. and Bot. A classificatory group comprehending a number of species (sometimes a single species) possessing certain common structural characteristics distinct from those of any other group.

The determination of genera, and of what characteristics are to be considered generic, is more or less arbitrary and empirical, and admits of continual alteration according to current knowledge of facts and ideas of classification in the respective sciences. The genus ranks next under the family or sub-family, and above the species; it is sometimes divided into sub-genera. The generic and specific names (always in Latin or considered as Latin) together form the scientific proper name of an animal or plant, the generic name standing first and being written with an initial capital. (The zoological term the genus Homo is popularly current as a somewhat flippant or jocular synonym for 'mankind' or 'the human race'.)

1608 TOPSELL Serpents (1658) 682 Because there be many kinds of Crocodiles, it is no marvel although some have taken the word 'Crocodilus' for the genus; and the several species they distinguish into the Crocodile of the Earth, and the Water. 1683 RAY Corr. (1848) 134 The description.. is scarce sufficient to determine to what genus belongs, which less whether it be a nondescript species. 1691 Great. nition i. -geny, suffix = mod. F. -génie, in mod. scientific language appended to Gr. stems to form sbs. with the general sense 'mode of production (of something specified)', as in anthropogeny, biogeny, cosmogeny, geogeny, ontogeny, phylogeny, physiogeny, etc. Most of these sbs. have either corresponding sbs. in -GENESIS, or adjs. -GENERIC (in many instances both of these).

Geology (dʒiˈɒlədʒi). [ad. med.L. geologia, f. Gr. γῆω-Geo- + -λογία discourse: see -LOGY.]

The med.L. word was used, perhaps for the first time, by Richard de Bury (14th c.) in the peculiar sense 'science of earthly things', applied to the study of law as distinguished from the arts and sciences which are concerned with the works of God. In 1687 geologia appears as the title of a work in Italian by F. Sessa, intended to prove that the 'influence' ascribed by astrologers to the stars, really proceeded from the earth itself. A work entitled Geologia Norvegica, containing a description of Hecla, is referred to in 1686 by Plot Staffordshire iii. 145; but, so far as at present known, the use of the word as a name for a distinct branch of physical science occurs first in English.]

b. Geometrical ratio (now usually ratio simply, as the expression arithmetical r. is obsolete): that kind of relation between two quantities which is expressed by dividing the first by the second; the quotient expressing this. (The term survives chiefly in the phrase at a geometrical ratio, loosely used for in geometrical progression.) Geometrical proportion: a proportion which involves an equality of geometrical ratio in its two parts, as 1:3::4:12. Geometrical progression: a series in which the ratio between the successive quantities is constant, as 1:3:9:27:81, etc.

Arithmetical progression, \dagger proportion, \dagger ratio, etc. (see ARITHMETICAL a.) relate to differences instead of quotients. The term Geometrical points to the fact that problems involving multiplication were originally dealt with by geometry and not by arithmetic.

Geotropic (dʒɪəˈtrɒpɪk), a. Bot. [I. Gr. γεω-

Geo- + τροπή -δς, f. τροπή turning.] Pertaining to, characterized by, or of the nature of, geotropism.

1875 BENNETT & DYER Sachs 756 Internodes with an upward geotropic curvature. 1880 C. & F. DARWIN Movem. Pl. 81 As soon as the confluent petioles protrude from the seed they bend down, as they are strongly geotropic, and penetrate the ground. 1881 McNAN Bot. vi. 266. 147 The main root with the concave side of the bent portion downwards is positively geotropic, the stem with the concave side upwards is negatively geotropic. 1891 F. DARWIN in Nature 27 Aug. 409 Roots and other positively geotropic organs bend owing to plasticity. 1897 Willis Flower IV. I. 21 We express this property of the root (to assume its original downward progress in growing when forcibly deflected from its course, e.g. by a stone) by saying that it is positively geotropic.

Hence Geotropically adv.

1882 F. DARWIN in Nature 27 Apr. 616 The central portion of the root, is capable of bending geotropically downwards. 1882 VINES Sachs Bot. 873 Geotropically curved stems and nodes of Grasses. 1891 Athenum 27 June 832/3 The protoplasm of heliotropically and geotropically curving cells and hyphae.

Geotropism (dʒɪəˈtrɒpɪzəm), Bot. [I. as prec. + -ISM.] First used in Ger. form geotropismus by A. B. Frank Beitr. z. Pflanzenphysiol. (1868).]

A collective term for the phenomena of irritability presented by various parts of plants in relation to the action of gravity. Positive geotropism: the tendency (of roots, etc.) to grow towards the centre of the earth. Negative g.: the tendency (of stems, etc.) to grow away from the centre of the earth.

By C. and F. Darwin (1880) the word was used in a narrower sense, as synonymous with the 'positive geotropism' of other writers, the term AGROGOTROPISM being substituted for 'negative geotropism'. DIAGEOTROPISM, the tendency (of leaves) to grow at right angles to the vertical, is a third variety of 'geotropism' in the original (and still prevalent) wider sense of the word.

1875 BENNETT & DYER Sachs' Bot. 758 The positive or negative character of geotropism depends as little as that of heliotropism on the morphological nature of the organ. 1880 F. DARWIN in Nature XXXIII. 179 The phenomena might result from the ordinary forms of heliotropism and geotropism acting in concert.

So also Geotropy.

Ger. gier, geier, gerfalte), Du. giervalk, ON. geirfalki.]

A compound of the word which appears in Eng. as FALCON; the origin of the first element is disputed, but the prevailing view both among Germanic and Romanic philologists now is that, while the recorded forms in the Teut. langs. are adopted from Fr., the ultimate source is the OHG. gtr uvalde (MHG. gtr, mod. Ger. gier), f. the root gtr* in OHG. girt, giri greedy. The suggestion that the med.L. gerfalco is derived from gyrus, gyrare, and refers to the 'circling' movements of the bird in the air, was made by Gerald de Barri (Giraldus Cambrensis) as early as 1188 (Top. Hib. ed. Brewer, i. xiii). A treatise on hunting by the Emperor Frederic II (d. 1250) contains a passage (tit. iv. 152, ed. 1596) in which the word is said to be either from the Gr. γίρως, lord, or from the Gr. γίρως sacred. The latter suggestion was prob. based on the current term falco sacer denoting a kind of hawk; but according to modern scholars sacer in this use (=Fr. Sp. Pg. sacre sb.) does not mean 'sacred', but is an adoption of the Arabic qagr. In the 16th c. hierofalco was adopted by ornithologists (Aldrovandus, Gesner) as the correct Latin form, probably from the observation that It. ger sometimes represents L. hier (as in gerarchia hierarchy); and it is still used as the scientific name of a sub-genus of the genus Falco. The view of some recent etymologists, that OF. gerfalco represents a popular L. hierofalco*, and that the first element of this is from Gr. ἱεράει baw, is very improbable.]

German (dʒɜːmən), a, and sb. 2 Also 6 germane, 6-7 germaine, germane. [ad. L. Germanus, used, as adj. and sb., as the designation of persons belonging to a group of related peoples inhabiting central and northern Europe, and speaking the dialects from which the 'Germanic' or 'Teutonic' languages have been developed.

The name does not appear to have been applied to these peoples by themselves, or to be explicable from Teut. sources. A view widely held is that it was the name given by the Gauls to their neighbours; the Celtic derivations suggested are from OIr. gair neighbour (Zeuss) and from Irish gairm battle-cry (Wachter, Grimm). According to Müllenhoff, Germani was originally the name of a group of Celtic peoples in north-eastern Gaul, was transferred from these to their Teutonic conquerors, and afterwards extended to all the Teutonic peoples.]

The pronunciation (dʒɜːmən), for which cf. clerk, sergeant, Hertford, was formerly fashionable, but now survives only as dial. or vulgar.

In English use the word does not occur until the 16th c., the sb. appearing in our quots. earlier than the adj. The older designations were ALMAIN and DUTCH (DUTCHMAN); the latter, however, was wider in meaning.

1868 Nat. Encycl. I. 619 Gerrymander, a method of arranging election districts so that the political party making the arrangement will be enabled to elect a greater number of representatives than they could on a fair system, and more than they should have in proportion to their numerical strength. 1881 *Mem. Hist. This was indicated on a map which Russell the editor of the 'Continent' hung in his office. Stuart the painter observing it added a head, wings, and claws, and exclaimed 'That will do for a salamander!' 'Gerrymander!' said Russell, and the word became a proverb. 1884 Times (weekly ed.) 17 Oct. 17/2 The Ohio Democrats had made a partisan gerrymander of certain districts in order to retain power. 1891 G. [a. ON. geta (gal, gatum, gelenn) to get, obtain, to beget, also, to guess (Sw. gilla, Da. gilde to be able or willing, MSw. gäla, Da. gätle to guess) = OE. gietan (only in the compounds a-be-, for-, ofer-, on-, under-gietan: see BEGET, FORGET), OFris. (bi-) gitan:—OEut.

getan*, gal-, gatum, gelono. The OAr. root ghed*, ghod* 'to seize', 'take hold of', is found also in L. præda (—præ-hida*) booty, prædium an estate, perh. also in hedera ivy (literally the 'clinger'); and with inserted nasal in L. prehendere to catch, lay hold of, Gr. xavdaveiv (aor. ἐχάδω) to hold, contain, to be able.

Of the compounds of gietan which existed in OE. (see above), only gietetan and for-gietetan survive in the modern language, and the normal equivalents beget and forget were displaced in later ME. in favour of BEGET and FORGET. Gower is app. the last author who employs bezet; forget disappears in the 15th c. except in Sc., where it is not yet extinct. This change was prob. due to the influence of the simple verb. Conversely, the solitary example in ME. of geten without prefix (sense 2b) may be referred to the influence of gieten.

The forms of the pa. pp. retaining the original vowel (ON. geleinn) are found in literature down to the 16th c., and in the north midlands and Yorkshire getten is still the dialectal form. From the beginning of the English history of the vb., however, it has, like most verbs with ME. open e in the present stem, tended to assume the conjugation of vb. of the e, a, o series (originally confined to roots ending in a liquid); thus in the 13th c. we find geten, gat, gaten parallel with stelen, stal, stolen. In the 16th c. the pa. t. was often get, by assimilation to the pa. pp.; and in the 17th c. this became the usual form, though gat is used in the Bible of 1611 and still occurs in archaic poetry. In England the form gotten of the pa. pp. is almost obsolete (exc. dial.) being superseded by got; in U.S. literature gotten is still very common, although Webster 1864 gives it as 'obsolescent'.

Geugaw, geugaw (gū'gō). Forms: 3 gugaw,

5-8 gugaw, (5 gwaw, 7 gugaw, guga), 6-8 gugaw, 6 gugaw, guy-gaw, 7 gugaw, gugaw, guigaw; 6-7 gew(e)gaw, 7 gewai(e), gew-gaude, 8 gugaw, 9 dial. geugow, geogaw, 6- geugaw, geugaw. [Etymology and primary sense uncertain; a reduplicated formation such as is commonly found in words of contemptuous signification. If the original application be to a musical instrument, the word may have been invented as an imitation of the sound; cf. Du. giegagen to 'bee-haw', bray. On the other hand, if the primary notion was that of 'a gaudy object', the suggestion may have come from the vb. GAW, with its variants or synonyms gaw, gew. It is not impossible that the word as applied to a musical instrument may be an independent formation. The mod. Du. giegaw, recorded once in the sense 'flourish, scalloped border', and now preserved only in a phrase of obscure origin belonging to the game of merels, is supposed by the Du. lexicographers to be an adoption of the Eng. word.

The commonly accepted view has been that the earliest form, which is written gugone (Ancient Riwle) should be read as gigewone, and that the word is a reduplicated formation from the root of GIVE v. On this supposition it would be identical with GIF-GAW and the MDu. gihewhage, of which a single example is known. But if this were the etymology, the initial would have been 3, not g, in the southern texts of the Ancient Riwle (unless indeed these texts have been transcribed from an original in northern dialect). Further, the proposed explanation does not account plausibly for the recorded senses, and it is doubtful whether the assumed development of gigewone into gugaw (15th c.), gugaw (16th c.), geugaw, is phonetically possible. The probability is that the u in gugone is a vowel.]

Ger. gurke, earlier also gurchen, Sw. gurka, Da. agurk), but the word must have been indirectly adopted from some Slav. lang.: cf. Slovenian ugorek, angurka, Polish ogurek, ogorek, Czech okurka, Serbian ugorka (the Hungarian ugorka, Lith. agurkas, Lettish gurkjis, nre adopted from Slav.); these words have a diminutive suffix, which is replaced by another suffix of like function in the Russian orypъrъ, Church Slav. орыпырь. The primary form is not recorded in Slav., but appears in late Gr. ἀγγούριον, ἀγκούριον (mod. Gr. ἀγγούρι), whence It. anguria a kind of cucumber, F. angourie, angurie (Coigr.), Sp. angurria (obs.) water-melon: see ANGURIA.

Ghost (g'ōst), sb. Forms: 1 gāst, gēst, 2-5 gāst(e), 3-6 gōst(e), 4-6 goost(e), 6 St. goast, goist, 5-6 ghoste, ghoost, (6 ghoast, 8 ghest), 5- ghost, 6- St. g'ghaist. [Common WGer.:

O-Tent. type gaisto*-z.

Although the word is known only in the WGer. langs. (in all of which it is found with substantially identical meaning), it appears to be of pre-Teut. formation. The sense of the pre-Teut. ghaidōz*, if the ordinary view of its etymological relations be correct, should be 'fury, anger'; cf. Skr. hṛdas neut. anger, Zend zōdāda ugly; the root ghai-, ghoi- appears with cognate sense in ON. geisa to rage, Goth. usgaigan to terrify (see GAST v.); outside Teut. the derivatives seem to point to a primary sense: 'to wound, tear, pull to pieces'.

The OE. form gēst is constant in the Exeter Book, and occurs 49 times in the Hattin MS. and 3 times in the Bodl. MS. of Alfred's transl. of Gregory's Pastoral Care; it is npp. not known elsewhere. The occurrence of gāst:-gaisti beside gāst:-gaisto is explained by Sievers (Gram. ed. 3) as indicating that the word, though recorded only as masc., was orig. a neut.-es-stem; it would thus correspond formally to the Skr. word quoted above.

The spelling with gh, so far as our material shows, appears first in Causton, who was probably influenced by the Flemish ghaest. It remained rare until the middle of the 16th c., and was not completely established before about 1590.]
